Origins and Philosophy

Michael Brown developed the Presence Process after extensive study of various psychological and spiritual traditions. The philosophy underlying the method integrates elements of mindfulness, breathwork, and emotional integration. It is based on the premise that true healing occurs when individuals become consciously aware of their emotional reactions and allow themselves to experience them fully without resistance. Conscious Breathing

Central to the Presence Process is the practice of conscious breathing. Michael Brown emphasizes the importance of deep, rhythmic breathing as a tool to access present-moment awareness and emotional release. This technique helps calm the nervous system and enables participants to stay grounded while confronting difficult emotions.

Emotional Integration

Emotional integration is a fundamental aspect of the Presence Process, encouraging individuals to fully experience and process emotions rather than suppressing or avoiding them. Through the use of guided exercises and mindful observation, participants learn to identify emotional triggers and patterns, facilitating their resolution.
