The Nature of Friendship According to Montaigne

Michel de Montaigne on friendship centers on the belief that true friendship is a rare and exceptional bond that transcends ordinary social interactions. He viewed friendship not as a casual association but as a profound union of souls, marked by mutual respect and understanding. Montaigne argued that unlike familial or romantic ties, friendship is freely chosen and sustained by genuine affection rather than obligation. In his essays, he described this unique relationship as one that involves complete openness and honesty, allowing friends to share their innermost thoughts without fear of judgment. This conception challenges superficial or transactional relationships, positioning friendship as a cornerstone of human flourishing.

Friendship as a Voluntary and Mutual Bond

For Montaigne, the voluntary nature of friendship is essential. It arises from a conscious decision to connect deeply with another person based on shared values and emotional resonance. Unlike kinship, which is determined by birth, or societal relationships that may be driven by convenience, friendship is an equal partnership. Montaigne emphasized that both parties must willingly engage in this bond, fostering an environment of trust and loyalty.

Friendship as a Union of Minds

Montaigne famously described friendship as a “perfect and entire accord of souls.” This metaphor highlights his belief that true friends achieve a level of harmony and understanding that is almost spiritual. Such unity requires intellectual compatibility and emotional empathy, enabling friends to communicate beyond words and to anticipate each other’s needs and thoughts.

The Qualities of True Friendship

Michel de Montaigne on friendship also outlines specific qualities that define authentic companionship. His essays emphasize sincerity, constancy, and selflessness as fundamental characteristics. Montaigne believed that true friends are candid with one another, offering honest feedback and support without pretense. Moreover, he argued that true friendship withstands adversity, demonstrating resilience and unwavering commitment. This section explores these qualities in detail, illustrating the standards Montaigne set for meaningful friendships.

Sincerity and Honesty

One of the pillars of Montaigne’s friendship philosophy is sincerity. He asserted that true friendship requires a complete absence of deceit or manipulation. Friends must feel comfortable expressing their genuine selves, including vulnerabilities and flaws. Montaigne saw this openness as essential for building trust and deepening the relationship over time.

Constancy and Loyalty

Another key quality Montaigne highlighted is constancy. Genuine friends remain loyal through changing circumstances and challenges. Montaigne argued that the durability of friendship is a testament to its authenticity, as it is easy to befriend someone in good times but much harder to maintain that bond when difficulties arise. Loyalty in friendship is a reflection of mutual respect and commitment.

Selflessness and Mutual Benefit

Montaigne’s friendship is marked by a selfless concern for the other’s well-being. True friends prioritize each other’s happiness and growth without expecting material gain or personal advantage. This mutual benefit is not transactional but rooted in genuine care and altruism, reinforcing the depth of the connection.

Montaigne's Personal Friendship with Étienne de La Boétie

One of the most illustrative examples of Montaigne's ideas on friendship is his relationship with Étienne de La Boétie, a close companion and fellow philosopher. Montaigne's essays often reference this friendship as the ideal type, characterized by profound intimacy and shared intellectual pursuits. The bond between Montaigne and La Boétie exemplifies the principles Montaigne espoused, making it a critical case study in understanding his philosophy.

The Depth of Their Connection

The friendship between Montaigne and La Boétie was marked by intense emotional and intellectual closeness. Montaigne described their bond as surpassing ordinary friendships, stating it was almost as if their souls were one. This extraordinary connection defied social conventions and emphasized the spiritual dimension of true friendship.

Influence on Montaigne's Writings

La Boétie's untimely death profoundly affected Montaigne and inspired some of his most reflective essays on friendship. Montaigne's meditations on loss, loyalty, and the rarity of such bonds are deeply informed by this personal experience. Their friendship became a lens through which Montaigne examined the importance and fragility of human relationships.

Friendship Versus Other Social Bonds

Michel de Montaigne on friendship distinguishes this relationship from other forms of social connection such as kinship, marriage, and acquaintanceship. Montaigne believed that while family ties are natural and often obligatory, friendship is a deliberate and voluntary choice that holds a distinct place in human life. This section explores how Montaigne contrasted friendship with these other bonds, highlighting its unique characteristics and superior value.

Friendship and Family

Montaigne acknowledged the importance of familial relationships but argued that friendship is a higher form of association because it is chosen freely rather than imposed by social or biological ties. He noted that friendships can offer a level of intimacy and understanding that family relationships sometimes lack due to their inherent obligations and emotional complexities.

Friendship and Romantic Relationships

While romantic love involves passion and desire, Montaigne's conception of friendship is devoid of such elements, focusing instead on intellectual and moral affinity. He suggested that friendship's steadiness and constancy make it more enduring and reliable than romantic attachments, which can be more volatile.

Friendship and Social Acquaintances

Montaigne contrasted true friendship with casual acquaintanceship, which he saw as superficial and often motivated by convenience or social gain. Genuine friendship, in his view, requires depth, trust, and mutual commitment that go beyond social pleasantries or utility.
