Transliteration vs. Translation: Understanding the Difference

When dealing with Quran Arabic words in English, two main approaches are employed: transliteration and translation. Both serve different purposes and complement each other in Quranic studies.

Transliteration Explained

Transliteration involves converting Arabic script into English letters so that the original pronunciation can be approximated. For example, the Arabic word الله is transliterated as "Allah." This method is particularly useful for those learning to recite the Quran but who do not know Arabic script. It preserves the phonetic integrity of the original words.

Translation Explained

Translation, on the other hand, conveys the meaning of Quran Arabic words in English. For instance, the word "Salat" translates to "prayer." While translation helps non-Arabic speakers understand the content, it may not fully capture the linguistic beauty and layered meanings of the original Arabic.

Combining Both Methods
